LinkedIn's 'most recommended resume writer' shares his secrets to CV success

One small mistake could be holding your job application back, a resume expert has revealed.

Former recruiter Patrick Harnett, who is now a professional resume writer and career coach, said one of the most common — and costly — CV mistakes he saw was jobseekers including their date of birth.

But he said many jobseekers also often gave their age away indirectly.

"A big one I see is a lot of people thinking they have to list their date of birth, but that's a big no-no because it can lead to ageism. It's also against the law to ask [a jobseeker's] age, so don't list it down on your resume," he said.

"People ask why — and it's because if a hiring manager asks a recruiter or HR person to find someone aged 30 to 35, even though they shouldn't ask that, if you are 36 and apply, you could be absolutely ideal but you won't be brought in for an interview.

"Another mistake is mentioning age identifiers on your resume. If you have the year you finished year 12 or a list of employment going back to the 80s, that's going to reveal your age, so be very wary of putting down dates.

"A lot of people also use email addresses like joebloggs82@gmail.com — a lot of people tend to use their year of birth in their address, and it's a dead giveaway."

Harnett, who is one of the most recommended resume writers on LinkedIn, said another huge mistake was CV length and incorrect formatting.
